TOUR 19TH-CENTURY JAPAN THROUGH THE PRINTS OF HIROSHIGE AT THE WORCESTER ART MUSEUM

Travels with Hiroshige* Explores the Artist's 69 Landscape Prints of Famous Sites Across All of Japan's Provinces, On View February 23 – May 26, 2019

Worcester, MA—January 30, 2019—This winter, the Worcester Art Museum will explore a pivotal period in Japanese history, through the eyes of artist Utagawa Hiroshige (1797–1858) and his print series Famous Views of the Sixty-odd Provinces (1853-1856). Created during a time of change—after a growing network of roads spurred an increase in tourism within Japan—Hiroshige's 69 prints tapped into this growing fascination with the country's landscape and captured many meisho, or famous places, long catalogued in Japan's literary tradition. Organized by the Worcester Art Museum from the complete set of this series in its collection, Travels with Hiroshige will be on view February 23 – May 26, 2019.

While Hiroshige did some sketching outdoors, for Famous Views of the Sixty-odd Provinces he referred extensively to other sources, including Japan's centuries-old landscape painting tradition and numerous commercial travel guides that had been developed before or during his lifetime. Among those was the popular guidebook, Exceptional Mountain and Water Landscapes (1800–1802). The result was a series of works that both aspired to topographical accuracy and yet were infused with an artist's creativity about imagined places.

This sensibility—in which reality was equal to the artist's own inspiration—is a continuation in visual form of a classical Japanese literary tradition. During the Nara period (710–794 CE), poets began linking specific thoughts or emotions with particular locations and seasons, which grew to evoke the moods of such places even if the author did not actually visit them. This tradition turned into a canon of famous places, or meisho.

“Utagawa Hiroshige's Famous Views of the Sixty-odd Provinces was an incredibly ambitious and innovative project in its time for depicting famous views of each province,” said Vivian Li, Associate Curator of Asian Art and Global Contemporary Art and the organizer of the exhibition along with curatorial researcher Susannah Baker. “From his use of irregular forms, unexpected vantage points, fine color gradations, and bold compositions, Hiroshige encouraged Japanese interest in visiting even the country's most remote places. But his lasting impact was in combining bold artistry with a sense of marketing, collaborating with his publisher to package the finished series together as an album that would appeal to experienced and armchair travelers alike.”

Hiroshige was born in Edo (present-day Tokyo) to a low-ranking samurai who served as a warden in the city's fire brigade. He inherited his father's firefighting position at the age of twelve, using the small stipend it provided to pursue his interest in art in his spare time. Eventually, he became a student of Utagawa Toyohiro (1773–1829), a well-established landscape artist and print designer. In 1822, Hiroshige retired from his fire warden position to earn a living as a full-time print artist, and in 1832, he traveled the major Tokaido Road between Edo and Kyoto. Upon his return, he created Fifty-Three Stations of the Tokaido, which established him as a leading landscape print artist, alongside his older rival Katsushika Hokusai (1760–1849).

Hiroshige pioneered improvements to the printmaking process, which also supported the growing popularity of the medium. By the mid-1800s, Japanese prints by Hokusai, Hiroshige, and others had captivated an international audience, most notably the French Impressionists. Claude Monet famously owned more than 200 Japanese prints, 50 of which were by Hiroshige—and eight of those prints owned by Monet are included in this exhibition. (The exhibition Monet's Waterloo Bridge: Vision and Process, on view at WAM through April 28, allows visitors to compare Hiroshige's and Monet's artistic approaches.)

Print connoisseurs appreciated Hiroshige's series Famous Views of the Sixty-odd Provinces for its brilliant display of techniques, including the use of printed gradations (bokashi), overprinting, embossing, and the use of woodgrain to add texture, as seen in Mikawa Province: the Horai Temple Mountains (first image above). He also used a newly available synthetic blue pigment for the sky and the sea, bringing in a strikingly different color. His last innovation was making his landscape prints in a vertical rather than horizontal format, a dramatic change followed by subsequent Japanese landscape print artists.

With Fifty-Three Stations of the Tokaido, and then again in Famous Views of the Sixty-odd Provinces, Hiroshige added another dimension to his depictions of each landscape by drawing on the Japanese concept of meibutsu, or regional specialties. These specialties may be local handicrafts or food products—or, in Hiroshige's time, medicinal cures, exotic creatures, and even magical souvenirs. In his 69 prints—one of each of the 68 provinces and one of the capital of Edo—Hiroshige represented a number of them with views related to each province's famous products, including several scenes of fishing and rice production, which were staples of the Japanese diet. This can be seen clearly in Tosa Province: Bonito Fishing at Sea (second image above).
